Understanding Organisations: a book of visual provocations

Prompts by Gordon Fletcher

Visual provocations give us a nudge to think about the world around us differently. When visual provocations are applied to a single area of thinking or a set of concepts the effect is all the more powerful. Any sense of normality, pre-existing beliefs or understanding are pushed to a breaking point as we try to make sense of these visual statements in ways that are not intended and cannot always be reconciled.

See these provocations as ways of reflecting upon what you thought you knew was certain. Is it because the image is incorrect? Is it because you did not have all the information enabled you to understand?

The images in this book are produced by artificial intelligence. The titles of the provocations were generated directly from the section titles – with additional style information – or were generated by prompting an AI with the section titles. The titles were then feed into a text-to-image AI tool that generated the image. Some upscaling (to make the images print quality) or refining (to make the images sharper and sometimes more visually attractive was undertaken). The generated images were not further 'tweaked' in Photoshop or any other editing software.

How do you understand an organisation? What is an organisation? Is an organisation a self-contained thing in its own right?

These provocations encourage you to think about what an organisation might be, how it relates to the rest of the world and to you.

The provocations focus on...

- The Nature of Business
- Structures and Functions within Organisations
- Leadership and Management
- Human Resource Management
- The Finance Function
- The External Environment
- PESTLE Analysis
- The Future of Business
